CELA is a legal aid funded specialty clinic focusing on administrative/environmental law.

The articling student deals directly with individuals seeking legal information, giving the student valuable practice in dealing with the public and potential clients. The articling student also gains background with respect to the process of developing policy as part of CELA's law reform activities.

Case Work, Legal Research and Litigation. Case work activities include legal research, writing memos and draft opinion letters, drafting motion records, affidavits and facta, meeting with clients, attending motions court, assisting lawyers at discoveries and hearings, and conducting corporate and title searches.

Legal Analysis and Law Reform. Students are given the opportunity to participate in researching and writing articles, position papers, and submissions under the supervision of CELA staff. There are also opportunities to appear before standing committees, city councils or commissions, and to give presentations at conferences.

Public Outreach. Most legal inquiries from the public are initially directed to the articling student who is responsible for researching the issue and providing an answer in consultation with one of the lawyers. Students may also write articles for the CELA website, give interviews, or deliver talks to school and community groups.

The student will be paid a competitive salary. Packages should comprise the cover letter, resume, transcripts and references, in a single .pdf file, and be sent by email.
